

ABSTRACT

Firstly, in this study, the translation of metaphor by professional translators has been explored in economics texts, specifically the economics report of the World Bank. The study on how Dobrzynska's theory was reflected in their translation has been carried out in order to draw some suggestions for students to apply appropriate translation procedure in translating metaphors in economics discourse. Secondly, what I attempt to do in this thesis is to contribute my humble study to help readers of this thesis be fully aware of what kinds of errors that the students of translators and interpreters training and even translators in general may easily make when translating metaphors in economics discourse. In order to do that, specific examples of errors were well discussed. Being well aware of these shortcomings, the researcher offer some suggestions and useful techniques for students to improve their translating skills.
